The National Museum of Egyptian Civilization is the first of its kind in Egypt and the broader Arab world. It is a comprehensive cultural complex that allows visitors to navigate through the history of Egypt and understand its various civilizations over time. The concept for the museum was initiated in 1982 when UNESCO, at the request of the Egyptian government, launched an international campaign to create the Nubia Museum in Aswan and the National Museum of Egyptian Civilization in Cairo. The construction of the museum began in 2002 in the historic area of Fustat, the first and oldest Islamic capital in Africa. An Egyptian architect won an international design competition to create the museum's unique structure.
